In Ontario, the franchise was extended to men who were not normally allowed to vote, including those under the age of twentyone and members of the First Nations, provided they were serving in the military. According to these regulations, medical requirements for volunteers to the CEF were fairly stringent. This version of the pamphlet dates from 1941. A somewhat different 1944 version is also available on Wartime Canada. Please feel free to contact either of the project codirectors, Jonathan F. Vance or Graham Broad. Skip to primary navigation. This HQ manages the 2800 strong Army formation responsible for the supervision, integration, resourcing and delivery of land operations training at the Combat Training Centre, the Canadian Manoeuvre Training Centre, the Canadian Army Command and Staff College, and across the country in the Canadian Army Divisions. The HQ itself synchronizes and coordinates training delivery via the normal headquarters staff functions that include personnel, logistics, communications, finances, business planning, operations, environmental, safety, performance management and public affairs. It trains over 1,000 members of the Canadian Armed Forces and other Government of Canada personnel each year in Kingston, prior to their deployment on operations. In addition, Peace Support Training Centre instructors provide mission specific Peace Support Operations training to thousands of personnel in Canadian Armed Forces contingents and Task Forces every year outside of Kingston. During the past several years, Peace Support Training Centre has also evolved as the Canadian Army centre of excellence for Information Operations Info Ops, and provides the baseline training of select Canadian Armed Forces members for CivilMilitary Cooperation CIMIC and Psychological Operations PSYOPS. Courses currently conducted at, or under the auspices of, the College include the Army Operations Course, the Primary Reserves Army Operations Course, and the Commanding Officers Course. As the authority for Canadian Army doctrine, the Army Doctrine Centre reviews and produces doctrine manuals, coordinates the production of Tactics, Techniques and Procedures TTP manuals, provides Canadian Army input to joint doctrine development, works toward the achievement of Army interoperability by participating in international programs NATO and ABCANZ, coordinates the development of Army terminology, and contributes to and supports Army capability development projects. The Army Doctrine Centre also directs the Army Publishing Office, an organization that supports publication production from final draft to delivered endproduct for the Canadian Army. Through the ALP, the LL CoP supports CA Commanders to plan and communicate experiences from operations and training with a view to institutional performance improvement. CASC is a support organization that provides support to CA, CAF, RCAF, OGDs, others. CASC employs military and independent contractors IC staff under authority of the Chief CASC. We provide constructive simulation CONSIM activity funding by CADTC in accordance with the SORD direction. We support levels 2 to 6 foundation collective training through the command support training center. The Centre's weapons effects simulation technology; purposebuilt urban infrastructure; roleplaying civilians; and resident Opposing Force enables the chain of command to confirm the readiness of the Canadian Army to conduct domestic and international operations. The cadre of Observer Controller Trainers ensures that commanders and soldiers alike are able to learn and gain the most from this training. Short of an actual deployment, Canadian Manoeuvre Training Centre provides the most realistic and dynamic experience imaginable of operational situations up to and including forceonforce combat. The centre consists of the Canadian Army Trials and Evaluation Unit, the Artillery School, the Infantry School, the Tactics School and the Armour School. Combat Training Centre also includes the Canadian Forces Land Advance Warfare Centre. This centre, located at 8 Wing Canadian Forces Base Trenton, Ont. The Canadian Forces School of Electrical and Mechanical Engineering at Canadian Forces Base Borden; the Canadian Forces School of Communications and Electronics at Canadian Forces Base Kingston; and the Canadian Forces School of Military Engineering at 5th Canadian Division Support Group Gagetown are also part of Combat Training Centre.

Such a process requires an effective, efficient Army Training Centre that produces the combat effective and readiness for all elements of the force. This combination reflects the intrinsic link between activities and effects across these two levels of command. It describes the Canadian approach to operations. Land forces apply their capabilities to complete a combination of physical activities and influence activities that create effects on the physical and psychological planes. In doing so, a wide range of targets is engaged. This range will certainly include adversaries, but also other groups, systems, and individuals within the battlespace and environment that play a role in reaching the operational and campaign objectives and end states. In this comprehensive application of combat power the military does not act alone, for many enduring solutions to a conflict requires the support of other agencies and elements of power. Thus, this publication does not view military operations in isolation, but places them in the context of a joint, interagency, multinational, and public framework. The doctrinal concepts are not necessarily new, but they only articulated in more detail. Land forces will undertake a wide range of tactical level activities in the prosecution of an assigned operation and the overarching campaign. They may be simultaneous or sequential depending upon the level of command. For example, a unit may be conducting an attack in one location, defending a vital point in another location, and securing a local populace and giving emergency aid in a third location.
